

Pursuant to a congressional request, GAO evaluated state and federal efforts to ensure that noncustodial parents with available health insurance resources cover their Medicaid-eligible children. GAO found that: (1) states are not ensuring that noncustodial parents provide health insurance to their children; (2) states and the federal government could save about $122 million annually if noncustodial parents provided insurance available through their employers; (3) federal requirements permit wide variability in state laws enforcing medical support; and (4) employer health plans covered by the Employee Retirement Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) can exclude noncustodial parents children from coverage, and states cannot compel coverage with their medical support requirements.
